Authorities said Guyer failed to appear at the Schuylkill County Courthouse on Feb. 6, 2025, for a parole revocation hearing. The original charges in the case include fleeing or eluding a police officer (felony 3); driving under the influence (misdemeanor); institutional vandalism (misdemeanor 2); and possession, sale or display of fraudulent documents (misdemeanor 1).

His last known address

Guyer

is 129 E. Phillips St., Coaldale, PA 18218.

RALLY

Health care is an industry that employs many blue-collar voters, Lamb said.

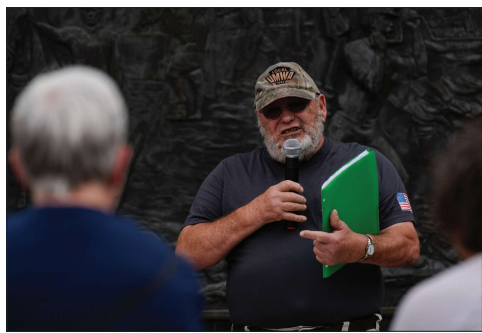

"But he (Trump) is taking a sledgehammer to it," he said. Trump has broken his vows to side with the working class and instead is working for the elites, Lamb said.

"He picked Elon Musk and Jeff Bezos and himself, not the people of Schuylkill County," he said.

Among the union leaders who spoke was Liz Bettinger of the United Steelworkers, who said that by diminishing safety net programs such as Medicaid and food stamps, the Trump administration was weakening communities.

Pennsylvania State Education Association representative Enzo Capozzelli said that Democrats have historically been the pro-union party and continue to be, something that union workers should consider when voting if they want to hold on to their collective bargaining rights, have job security, earn living wages, and have a dignified retirement.

United Mineworkers official Ron Stabinsky said by cutting federal job safety positions from offices such as the National Institute for Occupational Safety and Health, Trump is putting American workers at risk, including coal miners.

Schuylkill County Commissioner Gary Hess spoke about the importance of organized labor, not just for union members, but for American workers in general, and how it was important to vote for candidates that are pro-union.

Among those attending the rally was Jenn Brothers, a former corrections officer from Susquehanna County, who as a Democrat is challenging Republican Dan Meuser for his 9th Congressional District seat.

"Labor unions built our country," she said in support of the rally's message.

VOTER

David Becker, an election lawyer who previously worked in the Civil Rights Division and now leads the nonprofit Center for Election Innovation & Research, noted that nearly all of the requests for information cited specific sections of HAVA to justify them, except for one asking for the process the state uses to identify and remove noncitizens from the voter rolls.

"That's because there isn't one, and DOJ has no jurisdiction to request that data," he said in a text message.

Becker said the request otherwise didn't raise any specific concerns.

Arizona, Colorado and Wisconsin election officials have also received letters from the Justice Department, each one with a different set of requests or allegations.

A letter sent in May to Arizona's Secretary of State Adrian Fontes alleged that the state was not properly verifying voters' identities as required by HAVA, and threatened a lawsuit. Votebeat reported in June. Fontes, a Democrat, responded that state election officials conduct a complete residency and citizenship check and fully comply with HAVA.

A letter from early June sent to the Wisconsin Elections Commission said the state was not properly resolving administrative complaints as required under HAVA; the commission has been summarily dismissing HAVA complaints that are about the agency's own actions, based on a 2022 Wisconsin Supreme Court opinion. Colorado received a letter from the department in May asking Colorado for "all records" related to the 2024 election in response to a complaint the department had received.

The Justice Department also recently sued North Carolina over allegations that it had failed to maintain an accurate voter list as required by HAVA, and sued Orange County, California, over an alleged failure to provide some records related to the removal of noncitizens from its voter rolls.

The letter to Pennsylvania does not mention any complaint, or assert the state has done anything wrong. "We very much appreciate your cooperation in our nationwide efforts to monitor HAVA compliance," it concludes.

A spokesperson with the Justice Department declined to comment. The New York Times reported July 2 that senior officials in the Justice Department are exploring whether they can criminally charge election officials for not sufficiently safeguarding their computer systems.
